BERRY PLANTS

STREAMLINED THORNLESS BERRIES. These have come to stay and replace the thorny sorts. Most of the varieties bear more heavily, and the ease of handling and picking more than offsets the additional cost of the plants.

Thornless Loganberries.

Thornless Youngberries.

Thornless Boysenberries.

Thornless Cory's.

Thornless Himalayas (Oregon Evergreen).

Any of the above Thornless Berries,

This season we are introducing four new varieties bred and named by our State University, and tested commercially at Salinas. Supply limited. On request, we will advise best ones for your soil and climate.

UNIVERSITY

HYDE'S Phenomenal Nectar

These plants are now offered for the first time in quantity. A fine large berry of exceptional flavor, similar to the Boysenberry but often measuring $1\frac{3}{4}$ inches long, 1 inch in diameter, and running 20 to an 8-ounce market basket. Commercial yields are heavy. One of our fields gave three tons to the acre the first year, sixteen months after planting, and a larger, older acreage yielded over seven tons to the acre.

Prepare beds and fields with ample manure and plenty of irrigation. This variety is one of the best moneymakers known, if not the best.

35 cts. each

$3.50 per doz.

$20 per 100

The THORNLESS BOYSEN

This queen of bush berries has come to rule. A strong, healthy grower and a heavy bearer. The field shown here fifteen months after planting yielded three tons per acre of fine luscious fruit. Note the short coupling of the stems, giving more bearing surface. Pickers surely love the thornless canes; the labor of handling and picking is cut down over 20%. Another field two years old yielded $5\frac{3}{4}$ tons to the acre without irrigation. One field yielded over 8 tons under irrigation.

We advocate 8 to 12 tons of manure to the acre, chicken compost or sheep preferred. Ample irrigation is necessary.

50 cts. each $5 per doz.
